Lovingly, Nyasha knelt down carefully as <sup>the</sup> rich, dark soil clung to her soft, white Sari blowing elegantly in the wind. Being very gentle and quiet, she slowly approached her new spotty, reptile friend holding out her soft, slender arms in an attempt to pat the ~~garden snake~~ <sup>slithery</sup> garden snake gently on its sticky, slimy back as it swiftly moved towards her <sup>it.</sup> bangly, pearl-white diamond earrings,

Carefully, Nyasha knelt down carefully as the bright, red autumn leaves fell down from the colossal, dark tree Larch tree standing firmly on the rich, dark soil. As she took her gaze off the tree, she started to ominously and curiously look at her new slithery, reptile friend poking her <sup>his</sup> ~~her~~ head around the brightly-coloured Sweet, sticky Yam that she had just tendered. After walking for what felt like decades ~~at~~ in a scorching, hot day, a tired Muzaro and an eager Nyasha walked along the winding path gazing at the colossal palm trees towering over them like a tall servants shading them as ~~thou~~ they walked. Desperate for some delicious food, they tried to power walk attempting to leave their hunger behind. A few minutes of ~~tireless~~ <sup>tireless</sup> walking came by, until the trees stopped and they were met with a bright light. There before them was a large, sloping hill overlooking a majestic city.

"Father gather I think were here!" Nyasha said positively while jumping up and down like a headless chicken.

"Yes Yes I can see my darling chickpea!" said Muzaro enthusiastically forgetting about hunger.

Gripping her father's hand firmly, they slid down the slope. In the end, Nyasha saw her father reluctantly ~~stared~~ <sup>staring</sup> at his grass-stained clothes swearing under his breath. Finally, they were on their way.
